DIAGNOSING ANALGESIC NEPHROPATHY

"In making the diagnosis of analgesic nephropathy, it's often not good enough just to ask the patient whether he is taking analgesic tablets. Many of them will deny abuse; and in some cases it's taken six months or a year to get a patient to actually admit abuse. If you suspect the diagnosis for one reason or another, it's helpful to do a ferric chloride test on the urine. You can do this quite simply using a Clinistix.[®] Or you can measure the salicylates in the blood if you want to get a more quantitative idea of how much the patient is actually taking. Questioning the family is usually far more productive than questioning the patient. Even the pharmacist can sometimes be of considerable help."
